ABSTRACT

A revised landmark Carnegie classification of institutions of higher education, which includes enrollment data, is presented. The classification divides institutions into 6 main categories and a number of subcategories, or 19 categories in all. For doctorate-granting institutions, the following types of institutions are distinguished: research universities I, research universities II, doctorate-granting institutions I, and doctorate-granting universities II. For comprehensive universities and colleges, two types of institutions are categorized, and for liberal arts colleges, two types of institutions are distinguished. Professional schools and other specialized institutions include theological seminaries, bible colleges, and other institutions offering degrees in religion; medical schools and medical centers; other separate health professional schools; schools of engineering and technology; schools of business and management; schools of art, music, and design; schools of law; teachers colleges; and other specialized institutions. Additional categories are 2-year colleges and institutes and institutions for nontraditional study. The institutions are listed by state and by their public or private status. Additionally, for each broad institutional category, data are provided on number of schools, the number that are public, the number that are private, and the respective enrollments. (SW)

Preface

The Carnegie Commission's classification of institutions of higher education, first published in 1973,[1] has been used increasingly for research and analysis relating to higher education by many organizations and individuals. Developed several years in advance of publication for use in the Commission's work, it was based on 1970 data. In the years since 1970, new institutions have appeared, old institutions have disappeared, and many institutions have undergone changes that have called for their reclassification.

Thus, for some time the Carnegie Council on Policy Studies in Higher Education—successor to the Commission—has been aware of the need for a revised version of the classification. In preparing the present revision, based on 1976 data, we have sought to minimize changes in the classification scheme, in order not to disturb the continuity of categories for purposes of research concerned with changes over time. The few very minor changes in classification criteria that we considered desirable are explained at the end of the introductory section.

Despite the slower growth of enrollment in higher education in the 1970s, compared with the 1960s, total enrollment increased 31.0 percent from 1970 to 1976 (Tables 1 to 3). As in the 1960s, however, enrollment rose much more rapidly in public than in private institutions—37.3 percent in the former and only 12.4 percent in the latter. And patterns of growth among the various types of institutions differed appreciably between the two sectors. In the public sector, by far the most pronounced increase in enrollment occurred in two-year institutions, followed by Doctorate-Granting Universities I, Research Universities II, and specialized institutions, in that order. On the other hand, in the private sector, enrollment growth was spectacularly high among Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II, and was also very high among specialized institutions.

Growth in some of these categories, however, resulted from shifts in the classification of institutions as well as from growth of institutions that were in the category in both years. This was particularly true of the surprisingly pronounced growth of enrollment among private Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II. Much of this growth reflected rapid increases in institutions formerly classified as liberal arts colleges (especially Liberal Arts Colleges II), which had broadened their programs and enrolled additional students—often part-time and evening students—on a sufficient scale to meet the criteria for classification in Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II.

Thus, the enrollment changes shown in Table 3 are not comparable with those that would be indicated in a table in which the classification of each institution is held constant. The decline in enrollment in private liberal arts colleges, for example, results from shifts of institutions out of the two liberal arts categories and not from overall enrollment losses for the institutions that were classified as liberal arts colleges in 1970. In fact, on the basis of the 1970 classification (modified only by the inclusion of institutions added to or dropped from the official list of the U.S. National Center for Education Statistics—NCES), enrollment in private liberal arts colleges rose approximately 10 percent from 1970 to 1976.

Figures 1 and 2 show the changes in enrollment and numbers of institutions in the major Carnegie categories, for public and private institutions combined. Again, however, the changes reflect the shifts in classification that have occurred and are not comparable with changes that would be shown if the classification of all institutions were held constant. But this consideration applies primarily to the Comprehensive Universities and Colleges and the liberal arts colleges, the former of which gained in enrollment and in numbers partly because of shifts of institutions from the liberal arts to the comprehensive category, whereas the reverse was true for the latter. The comparatively pronounced growth of enrollment in two-year colleges was not significantly affected by changes in classification, nor was that of specialized institutions.

On net balance, 237 institutions were added to the official family of insitutions of higher education—144 in the public sector and 93 in the private sector—between 1970 and 1976. In neither sector, however, was the increase explained primarily by establishment of new institutions. In the public sector, the most important single cause was separate listing of branch campuses that had existed in 1970, but had not been separately listed by NCES in that year. There were also approximately 10 institutions that had shifted from private to public control. This left 68 public institutions (chiefly two-year colleges) that opened between 1970 and 1976, while during the same period 23 closed, leaving a net gain of 45.

In the private sector, the increase in number of institutions was explained quite differently. Only 35 private colleges opened between 1970 and 1976, while 85 closed, for a net loss of 50. Meanwhile, however, no less than 202 private institutions that had been in existence for some time—often 50 years or more—acquired eligibility for listing by NCES between 1970 and 1976. A number of institutions lost their eligibility for listing during the same period.

Essentially, to be listed by NCES, an institution must be accredited or have achieved pre-accreditation status. Since accreditation is generally a requirement for eligibility of an institution's students for federal and state student aid, the large increase in appropriations for student aid in recent years has created a powerful incentive for institutions to seek accreditation.[2] Among the newly listed institutions, 42 were proprietary. The rest were almost equally divided between independent nonprofit institutions and institutions with a religious association.[3]

[2]For a more extensive discussion, see Carnegie Council on Policy Studies in Higher Education. The States and Private Higher Education. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1977, Technical Supplement A.

[3]As officially classified by NCES, the majority were independent non-profit, but many of these clearly had a religious association.

All of the newly listed private institutions are in the Liberal Arts Colleges II, two-year, or specialized categories. The largest single number were theological institutions (70), followed by other specialized institutions (53), two-year institutions (49), and Liberal Arts Colleges II (41).

Thus, even in a period of comparatively slow enrollment growth, the number of officially listed institutions of higher education in the U.S. has increased substantially. In the course of this growth, American higher education has become more occupationally and professionally oriented. Whether we look at the enrollment data, or at the net changes in numbers of institutions, we find that the most pronounced increases have occurred among Comprehensive Universities and Colleges, two-year institutions, and specialized institutions. And within universities, professional enrollment has grown more rapidly than liberal arts enrollment.

We have no way of knowing how many institutions are lurking in the wings, perhaps on the verge of acquiring accreditation. What this analysis of growth and change over a six-year period does suggest, however, is that, even as we approach a period of virtually stationary enrollment in the 1980s, we are not likely to find that the family of American institutions of higher education becomes frozen into a static mold.

I should like to thank the members of our staff who worked on this revision of the classification. The work was supervised by Dr. Margaret S. Gordon, but major credit for making certain that each and every one of the 3,074 campuses found its proper niche in the classification belongs to Ruth Goto, while the lengthy and tedious job of typing the final list was shared by Sylvia Zuck and Florence Eisemann.

Introduction

This classification includes all institutions listed in the U.S. National Center for Education Statistics' Education Directory: Colleges and Universities, 1976–77. When a campus of a multicampus institution is listed separately, it is included as a separate institution in our classification. In a few instances, the NCES directory includes all campuses of an institution in a single listing (for example, the University of Kentucky Community College System), and in such cases the institution is treated as a single entry in our classification. One institution is omitted from our classification for reasons explained below.

Medical schools, schools of engineering, schools of business administration, and law schools are treated similarly. These institutions appear separately only if they are listed as separate institutions by the NCES. Most of the professional schools, however, are not listed separately, and their enrollment is included in the enrollment of the parent university or university campus. This is true even in a number of instances in which the professional school is not located on the main campus of the university, but on a separate campus, for example, Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine. Thus, for complete listings of accredited professional schools and data on their enrollments, it is necessary to consult publications of the relevant professional associations, such as the annual report on medical education published by the American Medical Association.

Our classification divides institutions into six main categories and a number of subcategories, or 19 categories in all. They are as follows:

1. Doctorate-Granting Institutions

1.1 Research Universities I. The 50 leading universities in terms of federal financial support of academic science in at least two of the three academic years, 1972–73, 1973–74, and 1974–75, provided they awarded at least 50 Ph.D's (plus M.D.'s if a medical school was on the same campus) in 1973–74. Rockefeller University was included because of the high quality of its research and doctoral training, even though it did not meet these criteria.

1.2 Research Universities II. These universities were on the list of the 100 leading institutions in terms of federal financial support in at least two out of the above three years and awarded at least 50 Ph.D's (plus M.D.'s if a medical school was on the same campus) in 1973–74. At least 25 of these degrees must have been Ph.D's. Alternatively, the institution was among the leading 60 institutions in terms of the total number of Ph.D.'s awarded during the years from 1965–66 to 1974–75. In addition, a few institutions that did not quite meet these criteria, but that have graduate programs of high quality and with impressive promise for future development, have been included in 1.2.

1.3 Doctorate-Granting Universities I. These institutions awarded 40 or more Ph.D.'s in at least five fields in 1973–74 (plus M.D.'s if on the same campus) or received at least $3 million in total federal support in either 1973–74 or 1974–75. No institution is included that granted less than 20 Ph.D.'s (plus M.D.'s if on the same campus) in at least five fields regardless of the amount of federal financial support it received.

1.4 Doctorate-Granting Universities II. These institutions awarded at least 20 Ph.D.'s in 1973–74 without regard to field, or 10 Ph.D.'s in at least three fields. In addition, we include a few doctorate-granting institutions that may be expected to increase the number of Ph.D.'s awarded within a few years.[1]

2. Comprehensive Universities and Colleges

2.1 Comprehensive Universities and Colleges I. This group includes institutions that offered a liberal arts program as well as several other programs, such as engineering and business administration. Many of them offered master's degrees, but all lacked a doctoral program or had an extremely limited doctoral program. All institutions in this group had at least two professional or occupational programs and enrolled at least 2,000 students in 1976. If an institution's enrollment was smaller than this, it was not considered very comprehensive.

2.2 Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II. This list includes state colleges and private colleges that offered a liberal arts program and at least one professional or occupational program, such as teacher training or nursing. Many of the institutions in this group are former teachers colleges that have broadened their programs to include a liberal arts curriculum. In general, private institutions with less than 1,500 students and public institutions with less than 1,000 students in 1976 were not included even though they offered a selection of programs, because they were not regarded as comprehensive with such small enrollments. Such institutions are classified as liberal arts colleges. The enrollment differentiation between private and public institutions was made because public colleges with small enrollments are usually new institutions that can be expected to grow rapidly. However, some predominantly teachers colleges, especially in sparsely populated states, have been losing enrollment in recent years, and in such cases we have continued to classify them in the 2.2 group, even when their enrollment has fallen below the usual minimum.

3. Liberal Arts Colleges

3.1 Liberal Arts Colleges I. These colleges scored 1030 or more

[1] In all cases the term Ph.D. also includes the Ed.D. and other doctor's degrees.

on a selectivity index developed by Alexander W. Astin[2] or they were included among the 200 leading baccalaureate-granting institutions in terms of numbers of their graduates receiving Ph.D.'s at 40 leading doctorate-granting institutions from 1920 to 1966 (National Academy of Sciences, Doctorate Recipients from United States Universities, 1958-1966, Washington, D.C. 1967, Appendix B).

The distinction between a liberal arts college and a comprehensive institution is not always clear-cut. Some of the institutions in this group have modest occupational programs but a strong liberal arts traditions. A good example is Oberlin, which we continue to classify as a liberal arts college. It awarded 76 Mus.B. degrees out of a total of 623 bachelor's degrees in 1974 and had an enrollment of 2,858 in 1976. Or, consider two Pennsylvania institutions, Lafayette and Swarthmore. Lafayette awarded 89 B.S. degrees in engineering in 1974 out of a total of 458 bachelor's degrees and has been included in our Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II group. Its enrollment in 1976 was 2,243. Swarthmore has an engineering program leading to a B.S. degree, but it awarded only 16 B.S. degrees out of a total of 280 bachelor's degrees in 1974 and had a 1976 enrollment of 1,223. Swarthmore has a strong liberal arts tradition and did not meet our minimum enrollment criterion for a private college to be classified as comprehensive, but our decisions in the cases of Oberlin and Lafayette had to be at least partly judgmental.

3.2 Liberal Arts Colleges II These institutions include all the liberal arts colleges that did not meet our criteria for inclusion in the first group of liberal arts colleges. Again, the distinction between "liberal arts" and "comprehensive" is not clear-cut for some of the larger colleges in this group and is necessarily partly a matter of judgment.

[2] The index has not been published but is available on tape from the Higher Education Research Institute, Los Angeles. It is based on average SAT scores (verbal and mathematical) of freshmen entering each institution, as reported in several institutional directories in the early 1970s.

4. Two-Year Colleges and Institutes

5. Professional Schools and Other Specialized Institutions

5.1 Theological seminaries, bible colleges, and other institutions offering degrees in religion. In general we include in this category only those institutions that do not have a liberal arts program as well as a religious program of instruction. Colleges that combine liberal arts and religious instruction are generally classified in one of our two liberal arts categories. However, if the liberal arts program appears to be very minor, and the primary purpose of the institution is to train members of the clergy, we classify it in this category. Like the distinction between a comprehensive institution and a liberal arts college, this distinction is not always clear-cut and requires judgment.

5.2 Medical schools and medical centers. As indicated in our previous discussion, this category includes only those that are listed as separate campuses in the NCES directory. In some instances, the medical center includes other health professional schools, for example, dentistry, pharmacy, or nursing.

5.3 Other separate health professional schools

5.4 Schools of engineering and technology. Technical institutes are included only if they award a bachelor's degree and if their program is limited exclusively or almost exclusively to technical fields of study.

5.5 Schools of business and management. Business schools are included only if they award a bachelor's or higher degree and if their program is limited exclusively or almost exclusively to a business curriculum.

5.6 Schools of art, music, and design

5.7 Schools of law

5.8 Teachers colleges

5.9 Other specialized institutions. Includes graduate centers, maritime academies, military institutes (that do not have a liberal arts program), and miscellaneous.

6. Institutions for nontraditional study

The perceptive user of the Carnegie Commission classification will note that we have made a few minor changes in the classification scheme. They are as follows:

1. Largely because of the proliferation of doctorate-granting institutions, we have added requirements calling for the awarding of doctor's degrees in several fields before an institution can be classified as a university. Thus, to be classified in the Doctorate-Granting I category, an institution must have awarded 40 or more Ph.D.'s in at least five fields in 1973–74 (plus M.D.'s if a medical school was on the same campus) or received at least $3 million in total federal financial support in either 1973–74 or 1974–75. However, regardless of the amount of federal support received, an institution is not included in this category unless it granted at least 20 Ph.D's (plus M.D.'s if on the same campus) in at least five fields. There were no requirements for distribution of Ph.D.'s among several fields in the original classification. Similar changes have been made in the criteria for Doctorate-Granting II institutions.

2. A number of institutions in our Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II classification which have been predominantly concerned with teacher training, have lost enrollment in recent years, as a result of the appearance of a very poor job market for teachers. Strict adherence to the minimum size criteria for inclusion in this category would have required shifting a number of these institutions to the liberal arts category. We decided to retain these institutions in the Comprehensive Universities and Colleges II category, which continues to consist in large part of teachers colleges, for purposes of continuity.

3. In the earlier classification, a bible college or theological school was classified as a liberal arts college if it had a liberal arts as well as a professional program. In this revision, we decided to classify such schools in the 5.1 category (theological seminaries, bible colleges, etc.) if the institution appeared to be oriented primarily or entirely to training members of the clergy, with a liberal arts program that was a very minor portion of its curriculum. The desirability of making this change was impressed on us by the analysis of sources of income of private universities and colleges that we undertook in connection with the Council's recent report, The States and Private Higher Education. We found a significant number of Liberal Arts College II that had almost no income from tuition and received the bulk of their income from gifts, suggesting, along with other evidence, that their function was to train future members of the clergy.

4. Similarly, a few other professionally oriented schools were classified in the relevant specialized category, even if they had liberal arts programs, if their programs appeared to be primarily designed to train for a particular profession, such as engineering or law. However, the number of such cases was very small, because an element of judgment was necessarily involved in determining whether or not the liberal arts program was a very minor part of the curriculum. In general, a school that had both a liberal arts and a professional program was classified as a liberal arts college, if small, and in one of the two comprehensive categories, if large.

5. In recent years, a number of institutions oriented to nontraditional study have been established, usually without a campus in the conventional sense. Examples are the State University of New York's Empire State College, modeled after Britain's Open University, and the Union for Experimenting Colleges and Universities (associated with Antioch) in Ohio. It seemed desirable to create a separate category for these institutions.

Finally, as in the original classification, extension division of universities and campuses offering only extension programs are not included. This explains the very minor difference between our total enrollment count and that of NCES. It also explains why we list only 3,074 institutions, compared with the NCES total of 3,075—we decided not to list the University of Maryland's University College, which is somewhat similar to an extension division.
